

Formes de l'ombra. Poesia 1966 - 2002

Narcís Comadira

Frisson

When you read me (I'm letting my imagination run away with me now), you, adolescent poets of the times to come, and decipher my words with so much patience, thanks to your intuition, your illusions and a dictionary, maybe thinking in very strange patterns, in a strange and mysterious language of "s"s and "z"s, weak enclitic pronouns, hyphens and apostrophes, like a war message in code so that a future enemy won't understand: will you traverse time heaped up in front of me and behind you, by then completely lost to us all, and enter my desolate words, ruins of a disconnected story, to find what makes you, what makes me, me like the old masters, you like me, neither old nor a master but attentive to this frisson
- let it not be lost! - traversing like a shuttle of desire the oh so stubborn warp of life, and will you, too, leave fragments in languages which will be lost, like mine, so that other adolescents in other times to come will decipher your words - all because of a frisson! - and so, from time to time, from one code to another code, again and again the same message will wander
- populous herds of words - until the end of the world, if the world has an end?

Translated by Christopher Whyte